Caleb is the director of policy at the Virginia Institute for Public Policy, an independent, nonpartisan, education and research organization that develops and promotes public policy consistent with the Virginia tradition of individual liberty, dynamic entrepreneurial capitalism, private property, the rule of law, and constitutionally limited government.

Caleb began as a volunteer and part-time editor for the Virginia Institute in 1997. In addition to directing the policy research, planning, and symposia curriculum for the Virginia Institute, Caleb also works with several organizations across the U.S. in developing legislative models, strategic positioning, and apologetics for use in public policy communication and education.

Caleb and his wife, Karina, have two homeschooled daughters, Audea and Olivia, ages 15 and 8, respectively.
